III. Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

A child is an amazing gift of nature. The most interesting thing about children is that they are not easy to understand. A child learns many things day-by-day, learns how to speak and grows beyond our perception. This is truly incredible. But where does a child grasp the will power from ? We seldom think about it. A fish swims, but it has all the necessary features in its body that helps it swim. Birds and snakes possess their special ability to fly and swim. Similarly, a child has an inbuilt ability that helps him/her learn and grow.

Heart, liver or kidney does not judge the personality of a human being. It is left to the nervous system. The brain of a fully-grown man weighs 1400 gms, whereas that of a woman's weighs around 1250 gms. The brain of a 6 year old child weighs little more than 1 kg. It is said that a brain possesses nearly 10,000 to 15,000 million nerve cells. Nerve cells in a newborn are located distantly from each other. As the child grows, the cells come closer and as the child starts learning, the changes become significant. As they keep coming closer, the child gets skilled and gains knowledge.

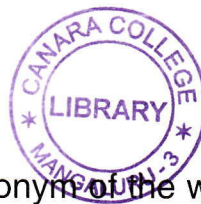

Therefore, nerve cells help a child in physical growth; the genetic factors make the child mature. Sometimes, we think that the child is growing up completely out of our efforts. This is just the matter of our ego. A child will grow even without any intervention from the elders. This does not mean that one should not bother to nurture children. Good care and nurturing helps in inclusive growth.

One way to understand the true meaning of learning is perhaps to note what learning is NOT.

First, learning is not an exclusive character of human beings. Even animals learn. Recent research conducted on the learning ability of the birds, dolphins, chimpanzees and other animals indicate that animals do learn in some way. But their learning systems are fixed and limited. They are stimulus bound. Many lower animals show extraordinarily complex behavior patterns which are not primarily a consequence of learning, but of involving specific practice and reward. Animals' behavior patterns are instinctual, not rational, whereas, the human learning systems are flexible and the potential for learning and remembering is unlimited in humans. Second, learning is not something found only in the classroom, taking place only in the presence of the teacher. Nor is learning regarded an array of behavioural responses an individual exhibits to a given set of stimuli. Every moment of his life man is engaged in trying to learn something new about the world around him, to unravel its secrets by asking prudent questions about things that surround him, that puzzle him. Learning takes place constantly, almost every day of our lives, with or without our awareness. An interesting thing about the process of learning is that children learn, and they learn something, even when we think they do not learn. Contrarily, children may not learn, even when we think they learn. (235 words)
